Funeral Waxen Efficies.

Toward the end of the fourteenth century arose the practice of carrying a waxen effigy of the deceased either on or before the coffin in the funeral procersion. The earliest instance of this practice is in the case of King Henry V whose effigy formed the first of those figures which are still preserved in Westminster abbey. This custom was only observed in the case of royalty and persons of high position. The expense of a waxen representation of the deceased would prevent poor people from following it. The waxen effigy of Oliver Cromwell lay in state while the body itself was being embalmed, so that most probably the actual corpse was never exposed to public view. The practice appears to have been discontinued shortly after the Restoration.-Westminster Gazette.
